What you need to know

- Qassem Soleimani, the head of Iran's elite Quds military force and one of the most powerful figures in the Islamic Republic, was killed early Friday in an airstrike in Baghdad. Thousands of people marched Saturday in a funeral procession through the Iraqi capital.
- President Trump tweeted Saturday that the U.S. would target 52 Iranian sites if Iran retaliates for the strike.
- The White House sent a formal notification to Congress about the airstrike as required by the War Powers Act.

- The president said Friday the action was taken "to stop a war." He said Soleimani "was plotting imminent and sinister attacks on American diplomats and military personnel, but we caught him in the act and terminated him."
- The Defense Department blamed Soleimani for the deaths of hundreds of Americans, and said he was behind recent attacks on coalition bases in Iraq, including one on December 27 that killed an American defense contractor.
- The strike drew a vow of "crushing revenge" from Iran. The State Department told Americans in Iraq to leave the country immediately, and U.S. troops in the region are on high alert.
- Lawmakers are divided over the strike, with Republicans applauding Mr. Trump's action and Democrats warning about the possible repercussions.
